GOWIN— In loving memory of our Dear Darling Richard Henderson Gowin, who died two years ago today.
Memories are treasures no one can steal,
Death leaves a heart ache that time never heals.
We do believe that God above created you for us to love;
He picked you out of all the rest
Because He knew we loved you best.
We hope God will tell him we miss him and we send him all our love.

This Lawyer Always Assists Really Innocent

PHILADELPHIA.—"I am innocent!"

Lawyer Herbert L. Maris hears that plea almost daily from men behind prison bars. Sometimes they say they didn't commit the crime for which they were convicted. Sometimes they insist the sentence was unjust and illegal.

In nearly 400 such cases, spanning 43 years, Maris has proved the prisoner was right. He has won their freedom—or shorter jail terms.

His work started out as a hobby. Today it is a full-time job, necessitating employment of three investigators.

Maris began as a corporation lawyer. Now 63, his hair gray and thin, he spends little time on his civil practice.

Maris is bespectacled, heavy-set. His brown eyes twinkle as he peers at you from a desk top cluttered with papers. A five-cent tablet serves as his appointment book.

Voice Carries Authority

He is a conservative dresser, favoring gray and brown suits. His mellow voice carries authority and conviction. He once was in politics and served several years on Philadelphia's city council.

Maris first heard the cry "I'm innocent" in 1926. The son of a Methodist minister was convicted of forgery. Maris proved the youth was the victim of a prank and won his release. Since then he has gained freedom for several accused of murder.

Maris never takes a case as the defense attorney at a trial. He steps in after sentencing and only if he's convinced justice was not done.

"Somebody must send for me," Maris says. "Then I check up on the case. If I believe there has been injustice I step in. I send investigators to the place where the crime occurred. We start from scratch.

"The first thing—the most important thing—is to learn if everybody in the case told the truth in court."

Maris, born a Quaker but now a member of the Christian Science church, is critical of "overzealous" police officials.

"When a serious crime is committed some one usually goes to jail, even if it's the wrong person. Authorities want the crime marked 'solved.'"

Avoids Publicity

Maris shies from personal publicity. He prefers to remain behind scenes, insisting he works better without newspaper headlines.

"I guess my work can't remain anonymous, but I can," he says. That's why he refuses to pose for newspaper pictures.

Generally, he gets little money in fees from clients—prisoner clients, that is.

"I try to get the prisoner to pay expenses of the investigation. I can't afford to pay the money out of my own pocket. Of course, if a man has no money and I'm certain he's innocent I take his case just the same."

Maris visits penitentiaries in the Philadelphia area two and three times a week. He interviews prisoners—usually 10 a week—and checks their stories. If he's convinced a man is telling the truth he'll help.

Tides Seal Slowing Up Planet, Extending Days

WASHINGTON—Tides raised by the moon in the earth's liquid core are slowing the planet's revolution and increasing the length of the day. This thesis is advanced in a report prepared for the official organ of the British association for the advancement of science by Dr. W. M. Elsasser of the University of Pennsylvania.

It long has been known that the length of the day is increasing by a minute fraction of a second each year. This generally has been attributed to the frictional drag of tides in shallow seas, the Bering sea alone accounting for almost half the effect.

However, it also is known that the core of the earth is liquid in a strange form—iron at an enormously high temperature but under tremendous pressure. But it would respond like water to the pull of the moon, Dr. Elsasser says.

These internal tides act like brakes on the earth's rotation, he explains. This theory, he says, satisfies the observed rates better than if the retardation were ascribed to the drag of sea tides alone. The theory assumes that the core of the earth is rotating somewhat more slowly than the shell and that there are areas of tidal turbulence, essentially storms inside the earth.

The idea of drag due to internal tides receives support from long-time records of changes in the earth's magnetism in local areas, recently published by the terrestrial magnetism department of the Carnegie Institution of Washington. These indicate a different rotation rate for the core and the crust and a gradual displacement of the latter from East to West. It is almost as if there were two rotating planets, one inside the other.

ROTATE RANGE AREA REGULARLY

When range areas where poultry has foraged extensively become "worn," it's high time to move the flock to another, better-grassed area. As a rule, rotation of birds and shelters on the range should be done every two or three weeks, without waiting for the forage to become thin.

Shelters that are made movable are much more practical for rotation purposes. If the shelters are built on skids they can be moved easily from one place to another.

AIDS DISEASE CONTROL

Rotating birds and shelters on the range helps keep down disease. When birds have been too long in one spot, they not only wear down the forage and make the area more subject to contamination with germs but also their droppings may contaminate the ground excessively. It is a good plan to remove the birds from droppings - contaminated ground before too long a period has gone by.

If the ground does not drain well stagnant pools of water are more likely to accumulate on "worn" areas. These can easily become breeding-ground for germs.

MOVE FEEDERS, FOUNTS

The same principle of rotation applies to range waterers and feeders. These should be moved regularly so that areas around them do not become contaminated.

In general, the forage area that is kept well-covered with a good crop—fairly close-cropped but not bare—is the best spot for the poultry range. Rotating range areas from one year to the next is also strongly-urged as a practical policy for poultry-raisers. This assures the flock of a good, healthful summer home.
